AgrAbility helps people with disabilities find success in agriculture

The national AgrAbility Project (NAP), modeled at Purdue University, is hosted at Purdue University in celebration of 30 years of making agriculture accessible for people with disabilities. Through educational programs that advance individual capabilities and the adoption of new technologies, networking opportunities, and direct individual consultations, NAP and 29 State AgrAbility Programs (SABP) provide a wide variety of disability-related information, services, and supports to agriculture workers. Traditionally known for helping those with physical disabilities gain access to assistive technology, AgrAbility continues to help those with a disability to succeed in agriculture. In collaboration with the National Center for Agricultural Disability (NCAD), AgrAbility works to ensure that persons with disabilities can reach their full potential in agriculture and that they have the same access to educational and employment opportunities as other persons.

AgrAbility provides services to farmers and ranchers with disabilities to help them continue to engage in agriculture. Services include a range of resources and support to enable farmers and ranchers to continue their work, including training, technical assistance, and support services. AgrAbility helps farmers and ranchers with disabilities to become successful in agriculture by providing them with the tools and resources they need to succeed.

Contact with AgrAbility on social media to learn more about assistive technology, resources, grants, and support for the supports for the challenges farmers face today.

AgrAbility offers a broad range of services to help farmers and ranchers with disabilities continue to work in agriculture, including educational programs, technical assistance, and support services. These services are offered to farmers and ranchers with disabilities to help them continue to engage in agriculture.
